I LIVED TO TELL ABOUT IT

BY TONY JENKINS

Snowmobile season is fast approaching and with that in mind we all hear the word “avalanche” sometime throughout the season. We might and the guys who were with me that day. Did I make a bad decision? Yes, most likely. I thought to myself with all these mature trees on the hillside hear it in the news or from checking forecasts and advisories. It's not a bad thing; it's just a natural occurrence that we as outdoor recreationist need to respect.

As many of you may or may not have heard last season, I was involved in a pretty decent-sized avalanche. As I look back to that moment to reflect on it, I try to learn from the incident rather than looking at it as a negative event. Yes, it scared the hell out of me

I most likely would be safe.

I was wrong.

The day's forecast called for “Considerable” avalanche conditions with more danger prevalent to northeast aspects. As I looked up at this hill I was searching for a line that I thought would be fun. As I planned it in my head, I shot up the hill and quickly cut right. As soon as I cut to the right, that's when the snow sluffed off the hill below my sled. I had the sled stopped, assessed the situation and thought I was ok.

Again, I was wrong. As I turned left, I looked up to the top and that's when the three-foot crown let loose. At this split second I deployed my BCA vest and heard the air bag go off.

Once the wall of snow came crashing down I knew I wasn't going to be sitting well because of all the old growth trees I was headed for. At this moment all I remember doing is grabbing onto the handlebars and hoping to ride the sled down with the sled on its side. As I did this I remember looking at a massive old growth tree and aiming the skid for the trunk of the tree. Once impact happened I really don't remember what happened other than me tucking into a ball and seeing nothing but darkness as I continued to slide through more trees.

Once the slide stopped I popped up on top of the snow bruised and shaken with one leg on top of the snow and the other buried. All I can say is I was lucky to have walked away with no major injuries. The sled was a loss but I was grateful to have walked away and have a good group of friends with me that day to be there.

From my years of riding in the backcountry I learned how to be a safer rider but even experienced riders make mistakes. Here are a few pointers that might help you.

1. Go out and take an avalanche course from a certified instructor.

2. Buy the correct gear—avalanche air bag, transceiver, probe, shovel and some sort of communication.

3. Spend some time using your gear and practice with your riding buddies.

4. Learn to check avalanche forecasts and ride according to the forecast. If the danger is extreme, stay home. If the danger is considerable think twice before trying to impress your friends.

5. Learn to let your ego say no. I'm at fault many a time because I seem to always want to push boundaries. In all honesty, how long can we live on luck? I was very lucky to have lived to tell and write about my experience.

6. If you don't know the riding area pay good money for a local guide who can show you around safely and maybe teach you a thing or two.

7. I'm glad the highmarking days are past us but with new sled designs and riding abilities, people are now riding a lot steeper terrain and using sidehills to get into new areas. Make sure to keep one sled on a sidehill at a time and always use the riding style of "bridges and islands." That means as one guy crosses a danger zone have one guy stop, watch the rider ride through the zone to a safe area and then turn around and watch your buddy cross the danger zone.

8. Communication. I can't stress how important it is to have some sort of radio communication with your riding group. You never know when someone is involved in a incident and by the time you realize it, it's too late.

9. You might own all the correct avalanche equipment but it's worth nothing if you don't check it each ride.

10. Be prepared for changing conditions throughout the day of your ride, especially when it gets warmer. When you start seeing snow falling out of the trees and water dripping from pine needles expect the conditions to worsen. If you have a storm move in with fierce winds, watch for storm slabs. SH

5 HABITS TO WORK ON

BY MATT ENTZ

Simply put, snowmobiling is the single greatest activity on the planet. I think I saw a recent meme in which President Trump confirmed that.

There are many different ways to enjoy snowmobiling, including boondocking, hillclimbing, jumping, racing, tree riding, powder turns, trail riding and the list goes on and on. We all have our favorite aspects. I am extremely fortunate not only to enjoy this sport myself, but I also get to spend every day on the snow helping others get more out of the experience as well.

At Mountain Skillz (www.mountainkillz.com) we specialize in working with people focused on technical off-trail riding. We welcome and enjoy working with riders of all abilities. This includes a variety of skillsets and experience levels from beginner to advanced and everything in between.

Sidehilling and tree riding are the primary aspects that we spend time teaching about and fine-tuning. Generally speaking, there are five riding technique-related habits that we continually have to break down and recreate with our clients.

VISION/AWARENESS

Vision/awareness is where it all starts in regards to technical riding. There are two incorrect items that I catch people constantly looking at: their ski tips and objects, usually trees. If you don't look up and ahead, you will never know what possibilities you have.

When looking at your ski tips, you aren't aware of what is around and in front of you. In this instance as your sled approaches an obstacle, you will recognize it at the last second, which causes hesitation. This is usually followed with a mistake leading to getting stuck or hitting the obstacle.

When a rider focuses on an object, chances are they are going to head toward that object. The solution is to always keep your head up, looking for possibilities and staying aware of your surroundings. If you know what gaps in the trees you can get through and focus on that, you are much more likely to successfully navigate between and around the trees.

I often tell my clients that they give the trees way too much respect. It's important to recognize that they are there, but our focus needs to be on where we can and want to go. The farther ahead you can see, the farther ahead you can plan and execute smoothly. Good awareness at all times will help keep us safe. This means looking around in all directions so that we can recognize changes in the terrain as well as in the snow.

THROTTLE APPLICATION

There are many ways to use the throttle that are appropriate for different situations. The key is knowing how much throttle you actually need.

As odd as it sounds, most of the time too much throttle gets people in trouble. If you're climbing a hill, racing across a meadow or cutting a long open sidehill, you can hold the throttle wide open or steady in one position and be just fine. However, when you mix in varying terrain and trees, too much throttle will lead to too much speed and getting out of control. Continuous partial throttle leads to many mistakes on the mountain also. Constant throttle means constant direction. When riding tight trees, you are always making directional changes. We typically

(top) Focus on the tree ... end up in the tree.
(lower) Good body position, vision and throttle control are essential for technical exploring.

initiate a directional change on our snowmobile by letting off of the throttle for a brief moment to cut the forward momentum.

Just as the momentum is altered, we provide a slight body and/or steering input. As this input creates action to one side or the other from our machine, we are quickly back on the throttle to complete the execution of the maneuver.

In my riding area we are always dealing with different snow conditions. We don't pick and choose the conditions. I ride every day and love all snow conditions. The less consistent the snow is, the more precise you must be with your throttle. Constant partial throttle in this condition will lead to track spin and trenching. You guessed it: now you're stuck. In this situation, quick on/off blips of the throttle help keep your sled on top of the snow. Staying on the throttle creates a sawing action by the track in the snow as it's constantly clawing through whatever snow it can grab ahold of.

However, with the quick blips, for the brief moment that you let off the throttle, the track stops sawing and digging and it has a chance to freewheel and coast on top of the snow. Your thumb is responsible for this action. The quicker and more aggressive you can operate the flipper, the more successful you will be with this technique.

FOOT POSITION

Where a rider places his feet in relation to the snowmobile can have major impacts. The biggest mistake I see riders making when riding technical terrain is standing too far forward. By this I mean all the way forward. In this position, your torso is in/over the handlebars. I often refer to this rider as T-rex. T-rex has no leverage and is a terrible rider.

Our body needs space to work with. The ideal body position is knees and elbows slightly bent. From here, you have a lot of power and leverage to manipulate your snowmobile and apply technique to make it do what you need it to. You can get too far back on the running boards as well. From this position you become stretched out and lose strength, leverage and control.

Foot position is all about finding the sweet spot for the current situation. That sweet spot

Taking this a step farther (literally) is what you are doing with your “off” foot when riding wrong foot forward. This “off” foot can be very helpful. When timed with a quick application of throttle, pushing off the snow will help propel your sled out of a hole. If you watch someone sidehill through the trees, you will notice them planting that “off” foot and using it quite frequently. There is a little bit of planning and awareness involved.

For example, don’t step too close to a tree. If you do, you will end up in a treewell. To prevent this, recognize where the soft zone around the tree is and plan to take a step just before that and land just beyond it for your next step. Another advantage to your “off” foot is controlling how far on edge your snowmobile is.

The result of standing too far forward and losing your edge on the mountain.

James Gallegos helping a client with his body position.

CONTROLLED MOMENTUM

Momentum is important in all aspects of riding. More specific to technical riding is controlled momentum. Too much and we’re risking a crash or not being able to maneuver around an obstacle. Not enough and we’re simply not going to make it and probably end up stuck. Controlled momentum is finding that balance. It’s like combining aggression and precision. It is also a skill being able to understand when you don’t have enough momentum and need to turn out or implement Plan B. An important element riders often forget about that is very helpful in regards to controlled momentum is the brake.

If you come into a situation a little too fast, you can always tap the brake to achieve more control and the precise speed that you need. On the contrary, when you approach a situation too slowly, it's impossible to gain speed beyond a certain point. The on/off throttle application that I talked about earlier is a key aspect to controlled momentum.

*Not enough momentum.
Get unstuck and try again.*

CONFIDENCE

Far too often I watch riders attempt a line and fail simply because they don't think they can make it. In that case, I ask them why they would try something they don't think they can do? It always leads to a great teaching moment.

Once we take some time to evaluate the entire situation and talk through the different aspects, options and riding techniques, they realize that they CAN make it. Simply approaching with the mindset that you can and knowing what you need to do to execute will set you up for success.

Confidence is built by starting small and being successful. Experience also builds confidence. We don't always succeed at everything on our first try. Learn from your mistakes and apply that knowledge on your next attempt.

The combination of these habits all being

WORLD CHAMPIONSHIP SNOWMOBILE HILLCLIMB

If you haven't ever been to Jackson, WY, and watched the World Championship Snowmobile Hillclimb, you haven't seen some of the gnarliest snowmobile racing on the planet.

It's not just hillclimb racing, it's hillclimb racing at Jackson Hole on Snow King Resort's Exhibition Run. The site of this Rocky Mountain Snowmobile Hillclimb Association-sanctioned race is what makes the difference. Exhibition Run is a double black diamond run with 1,571 feet of vertical rise (read: it's really, really steep).

That steepness brings out the best in the racers and, sometimes, the best carnage in all of snowmobile racing.

Sponsored by the Jackson Hole Snow Devils, the World Championship Snowmobile Hillclimb brings together the best hillclimbers in the snowbelt to compete against each other, the mountain and time.

All of this is best viewed in person. You get the best feel for the event while standing near the start or along the steep edges of the race course up Exhibition Run. Race organizers have, in recent years, broadcast the event over the Internet and, thanks to some strategic placement of cameras, you can see some exciting action.

But if you have the chance, see it in person.

The event is held every March. Here's a look back at some of the scenes from the 2018 World Championship Snowmobile Hillclimb. SH

ANOTHER BIG EVENT HITS JACKSON HOLE

STORY AND PHOTOS
LANE LINDSTROM

Jackson Hole is used to big time events—summer and winter.

So when the AMSOIL Championship Snocross rolled into town in early December 2017, it joined a long list of successful events that have taken place over the years. One of the—if not the—biggest snowmobile events that takes place anywhere in the North American snowbelt is the World Championship Snowmobile Hillclimb, held annually in Jackson, WY, at Snow King Resort.

The Jackson Hole Snocross National can now be added to that prestigious list of successful snow events, drawing snocross racing's biggest names and thousands of spectators to the base of Exhibition Run at Snow King Resort.

Little did spectators know that the 2017 Jackson snocross would be the final season of racing for the king of snocross racing, Tucker Hibbert. And did he put on a show for the fans who braved bitterly cold temperatures to watch racing action during the day and under the lights at night.

It had been years since the AMSOIL Championship Snocross came as far west as the circuit did for the Jackson Hole Snocross National, sponsored by the Jackson Hole Snow Devils.

FORWARD THINKING FOR THE BACKCOUNTRY.

And it's an event that Mother Nature did very little to help happen. The track was a bit of a miracle in and of itself, as there was not an abundance of snow early last winter. So race organizers used snow that was made at Snow King Resort along with some snow trucked in from Teton Pass.

With the man-made and natural snow holding up well under the cold temps, the races were held without a hitch, really, a credit to Snow King Resort and ISOC race organizers.

Racing under the lights at Snow King was full of excitement and plenty of drama in some of the finals as thousands of fans lined the fences to watch the action. Racing took place most all day of both days of the Jackson Hole Snocross National but the Pro, Pro Lite and Pro AM Women finals were held under the lights.

Here's a look back at the two days of racing that featured plenty of action, some drama and a great opportunity for western race fans to see a national snocross event. SH

For me, sledding is all about pushing the limit and attempting to be the absolute best rider I am capable of. Sometimes I forget to slow down and enjoy just how incredible the backcountry is. This feature brought me back to the roots of my passion, reminding me why I am so obsessed and passionate about our sport.

—Caleb Kesterke

Like every good cameraman, I talked my buddies Joe Calabrese and Shawn Kazmierski into dropping down a nasty sidehill into a creek bottom with the only way out being down the river. Joe went first and ended up in the creek bottom with only minor scratches. Shawn learned from Joe's line and nailed an epic run down the river. Puts a big smile on everyone's face when we talk about that day.

I was up in Whistler, BC, with Cody McNolty chasing one of the gnarliest storms of the season for 509 Volume 13. Every day we woke up to 3-4 feet of fresh. Coastal British Columbia can pack a serious punch. The sun was going down and we stopped for the classic "one last rip" and I held her full boost until the sled was stuck to the spindles. Cody thought he would come and help and just about completely buried my sled with his selective parking spot.

—David McKinney

Riding with Andrew Munster is quite the experience. He is a 120 percent go-getter and the dude just sends it. Here I captured him performing a perfect lawn dart. Of course it was after he was upside down showing us his 165 turbo can get inverted.

Last year my cousin snow-checked a Summit 850 so we went for an early season ride in Whistler, BC, to break it in. We stopped for a break after about an hour (still 92 percent left on the break-in) and Tyler told me to hop on and take it for a spin. Coming off an '09 Summit, I wasn't used to the nimbleness of the new Ski-Doo. I made it about 100 feet until I oversteered and drove the $18,000 machine straight into a tree, breaking an intake, some plastics and the brake line, as well as bending the handlebars. Let's just say he probably won't be letting me help break-in his sled.

This picture makes me laugh every time I see it. This incredibly fun group from the East Coast came out to ride with us and unfortunately their wingman on the right got in a fight with a tree on day two. The tree won. We were riding in a new location following our fearless leader Dan (Gardiner) and he took us down into this nasty creek bottom. The creek was starting to open, the walls were getting steeper and the rocks were showing more. With all of this you had to sidehill slowly and carefully navigate. There were four of us and you couldn't follow in anyone else's tracks in fear of hitting a rock. This was also at the end of the day where everyone was tired. Poor Anthony Oberti was struggling this day and found himself at the bottom of the creek a couple of times upside down. In this picture he was using words that little ones shouldn't hear and Dan the Danimal walked back to help him with his upside down sled. As I remember ,before the sled rolled into the creek you could hear his turbo spooling up with great power then you hear Anthony say, "oh boy" and the sled tumbling down into the creek. This happened to be towards the beginning of this creek bottom and as we moved down there was no trail. And you couldn't climb up to get out, the snow was extremely thin if none existent in spots, there were downed trees everywhere and the creek was completely open. To say the least Anthony was not happy with Dan's shortcut. —Tracy "Smasher" Kaltenbacher

This was the end of the road. I was trying to lead the film crew of Fresh Set Of Tracks to an area that I've been to on dirt bikes. However, the trees were so tight that it made travel next to impossible. Cody McNolty and I made it to this point but the film crew had had enough and called it quits. We were literally 100 feet away from breaking through, but we didn't know it at the time.

DELUXE ACCOMMODATIONS

BY KYLE HEAPS

Last season due to the lack of snow in Utah we were forced to make the drive nearly every weekend to Wyoming to ride sleds.

One trip in particular I'll never forget is when we decided to save a little money and sleep in our snowmobile trailer at night while in Jackson, WY. It was mid-December and we brought sleeping bags, a generator and a space heater thinking we were going to have a nice comfortable (free) place to sleep.

We get up to Jackson around 11 p.m. and pulled into a church parking lot thinking this would be the safest place to stay.

We off-loaded our sleds (sorry neighbors) and started setting up for our luxurious night out. By the way, the outside temperature was near 0 degrees F. We learned real quick that the inside of the trailer would be even colder than the outside temperature.

The space heater practically did nothing as far as heating the trailer and our generator overheated at some point during the night.

We probably got no more than two hours of sleep because we were absolutely freezing. We got up around 5 a.m. and immediately put on our riding gear and headed to a local diner for a warm meal. After some biscuits and gravy, we headed up towards Togwotee. As we arrived we were blown away at how much new snow had fallen overnight.

Stoke was high and we quickly forgot how tired and cold we were. Although we had what I think to myself a near-death, sleeping experience we ended up having one of the best riding days ever.

It's experiences like these that make this sport so fun and unpredictable.

SNOWEST'S ULTIMATE SNOWMOBILE TRAVEL GUIDE

TIME TO MAKE PLANS FOR YOUR WINTER SNOWMOBILE VACATION

Although snow covers the better part of North America, that doesn't mean you can go just about anywhere to snowmobile. To experience the best western snow conditions, you need four things—snow, access, trails and accommodations.

The Ultimate Snowmobile Travel Guide is designed to show you the most aggressive marketing areas in the snow belt that want your business. These are resorts and businesses that are proud of their respective riding conditions and do the most they can to provide you with a memorable snowmobiling experience.

To make the guide easy to follow, we have broken these businesses down by state. So if you are looking to go to any particular western state to ride, you can quickly find the best accommodations or contacts to help you plan your winter snowmobiling vacation.

So take some time and look around. There are plenty of exciting areas just waiting to be explored.

THREE BEAR LODGE AND RESTAURANT

WHO WE ARE

The renowned Three Bear Lodge has been a beloved destination for generations of Yellowstone visitors from all over the world. Three Bear Lodge was originally built in 1932 and is ideally situated near the west entrance of Yellowstone National Park.

Fire has twice forced the Three Bear Lodge to rise from the ashes. Following a blaze in 2008, the surviving materials from the lodge were carefully preserved and repurposed in the reconstruction. Rustic reclaimed wood and stones were handcrafted into unique fixtures and furnishings that adorn the foyer, hallways, massive fireplace and every guest-room.

For over 40 years, Three Bear Lodge has been a hub for sled rentals as well as guided and unguided snowmobile tours just outside of Yellowstone. There are also guided snowmobile and snowcoach tours inside the National Park; including daily excursions in historic Bombardier snowcoaches which have taken visitors to Old Faithful through the snow for decades.

QUICK FACTS

- Three Bear Lodge built in 1932, Re-built 2008
- Three Bear Restaurant: Breakfast & Dinner icon open since 1955
- Owned and operated by Clyde Seely since 1971
- Operating 9 Historic Bombardier Snowcoaches and 4 Vanterras
- Operating 95 sleds: 36 enter park per day
- Complete snowmobile clothing and necessities available.

SLED MONTANA FROM GLACIERS TO GEYSERS

Montana is a mecca for sled heads, where big skies and big powder give way to some of the country's longest and most scenic rides. 4,000 miles of groomed trails crisscross sweeping mountain-meadow playgrounds, deep untouched backcountry, rugged ridgelines, frozen alpine lakes, old mining country and ghost towns, plus logging and Forest Service roads.

The best riding in Montana is found in Glacier Country and Yellowstone Country, where epic terrain and scenic vistas overflow from the stunning national park landscapes that anchor each region. Both areas deliver world-class snowmobiling among premier mountain towns, thriving with a palpable exuberance for hard-core snow play.
